In the endless cycles of news involving Muslims and violence in the US and abroad, many Americans have concluded that Islam is somehow inherently violent. Some more severe critics of Islam point to specific passages in its scriptures or to surveys reporting public opinion in the Muslim world. Others (including the vast majority of Muslim voices) contest these arguments, stating that Islam is misunderstood by a radical super-minority. How should we approach these questions, and what do our choices mean about how we think about religion and communities?

BEING RELIGIOUS INTERRELIGIOUSLY
In the endless cycles of news involving Muslims and violence in the US and abroad, many Americans have concluded that Islam is somehow inherently violent. Some more severe critics of Islam point to specific passages in its scriptures or to surveys reporting public opinion in the Muslim world. Others (including the vast majority of Muslim voices) contest these arguments, stating that Islam is misunderstood by a radical super-minority. How should we approach these questions, and what do our choices mean about how we think about religion and communities?

FEATURING JONATHAN BROWN
Jonathan Brown is the Alwaleed bin Talal Chair of Islamic Civilization in the School of Foreign Service at Georgetown University, and the Director of the Alwaleed bin Talal Center for Muslim Christian Understanding. Prior to these posts he was an Assistant Professor of Arabic and Islamic studies at the University of Washington. His scholarship includes four books and a variety of articles dealing with a variety of topics in Islamic studies and he serves as Editor-in-Chief of the Oxford Encyclopedia of Islam and Law. Dr. Brown has studied and conducted research throughout the Middle East and Asia. He received his doctorate from the University of Chicago in 2006.

QUESTIONS?
Contact Dr. John Sheveland, Religious Studies
509.313.6784 | sheveland@gonzaga.edu
gonzaga.edu/religious-studies